I spent an evening exploring and playing. As some folks have commented, the dungeons are pretty fantastic for playing, but I was happily just killing the heck out of bandits in the fields for the drops. Still haven't completely figured out the combat mechanics - why sometimes my Champion Dwarf kills with a few hits and others I'm stuck in a repetitive slug fest. Either way, my first impressions were positive.

Lag was minimal. I did have to set video settings lower to prevent lots flaring bright spots. There's a good amount of running back and forth which takes time. Not as much lootable material in the town area or even the farm fields. Fighting flying creatures was tougher than expected with melee weapons. Leveling up is a slow grind on the surface, but the crypt is accelerating that now. The onhand inventory is large and the bank has one free safety deposit box for a character (the others require selling drops to earn enough coins to unlock them).

Gameplay is generally like a lower end ESO. Graphics are decent. The combat AI does do some weird things (fireballing the heck out of a door because the caster didn't actually clear the doorway to fire at my character). However, the only glitchy behaviour was spawning mobs directly on top of me. It's happened enough times to know that it's a quirk versus a game topography issue.

To some extent, I wish this was a stand alone local game. Having it as an MMORPG at the current prices seems to imply it will inevitably be shuttered. It's more toony and accessible as a pick up game, and I could see people investing a weekend with friends or solo'ing just for fun, and then setting it aside for a few months before coming back to it. That rarely supports a full fledged online server presence.

Happy to recommend for people who want a nice questing and crawling game with easy to master functions. If you need a fully polished and more immersive experience then you probably want ESO.. Had a ton of potential, but Industry Games straight up abandoned it to go work on other projects. The game can still be played IF you have a few friends that have a copy as well. The solo game doesn't exist since the player base left when the devs abandoned it. Otherwise, save your money and avoid anything from Industry Games.
